In recent weeks the four buildings on the Heber City town square have been measured, photographed, drawn and researched so that they may become part of the records of the Historic American Buildings Survey in the Library of Congress. This is part of a summer project jointly sponsored by the National Park Service and the Utah Heritage Foundation. Materials from HABS files are available for reproduction for students, authors and publishers of architectural and historical material. Because the Heber City buildings are individually interesting and compose a unique group in a handsome park, they have been given high priority among the sites to be surveyed in Utah this summer.

ACCOMPANYING EACH set of measured drawings and photographs will be a history of the structure. Documentary sources are seldom complete and the members of the survey team have a number of questions about the Heber City buildings for which readers of the Wasatch Wave may be able to provide answers. A number of these questions are suggested by old photographs; others come from clues provided in the buildings themselves.

For example, the interior plan and stair in the courthouse were different before the additions in 1924. What was the original arrangement?

nationally recognized historians, architects and tourism officials have strongly recommended the development of the entire town square as a park and historic site, retaining all of the buildings of this, the last Mormon pioneer town square. They note that in addition to the historic and architectural values and the cultural and recreational facilities of the Tabernacle and Social Hall, that the original section of the Courthouse, standing a great economic asset in its unique town square pioneer buildings and beautiful grounds — by developing exciting presentations of drama, music, dance, crafts, art and educational exhibits. The exhibits were considered to be most effective when prepared with life-size models and using authentic furnishings and equipment, showing brick-making, butterchurning, rug weaving, family socials in the parlour and so on.

County Commission Makes Final Courthouse Decision

Architectural Drawing Shows New Courthouse Location

The Wasatch County Commission issues the following mission statements to clarify any misunderstandings on the location of the new Wasatch County Courthouse which may have arisen through recent articles published by groups from outside the County.

THE PRESENT AND preceding Wasatch County Commission discussions for several months with the Heber City Council the advisability of Heber City purchasing an alternate building site on Main St. on which to build a courthouse.

This site would be given to Wasatch County in exchange for the present site and allow expansion of the Heber City park. Prices and appraisals were obtained on several tracts of land. On January 18th the Wasatch County Commission requested by letter a decision from Heber City on this matter so that construction on the new Courthouse could be started. Due to the prohibitive cost of a suitable alternate site Heber City advised they were not interested in this proposition.

What significant events and individuals are associated with each building? Builders and designers are important to the survey but so are speakers in the tabernacle, judges and trials in the courthouse, celebrations in the social hall and prisoners in the jail.
